ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Seeing this book out into the world has taken much longer than I expected. I am grateful to all those who helped its meandering journey. It all started at the University of Toronto, and I thank the faculty and fellow graduate students who helped this project germinate. I am endlessly grateful to my advisor, Andre Schmid, for encouragement, inspiration, and always-so-thoughtful comments. My committee members—Joshua Barker, Tania Li, and Janet Poole all provided helpful critiques and suggestions. I also benefited from advice and encouragement from Ken Kawashima. From my grad school cohort, I reserve special thanks for Lindsay Bell, my writing partner during the last year. Finally, I am indebted to the late Nancy Abelmann, who, in her capacity as external reviewer provided extensive comments that helped chart the path for reworking the original study into a book. The research that informed this study was funded by the Wenner-Gren Foundation and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada.

Most work on the manuscript was done while I was at the East Asian Studies Department at New York University, and I thank my NYU colleagues—Henry Em, Rebecca Karl, Phillip Kaffen, Tom Looser, Arvind Rajagopal, Ethan Harkness, Moss Roberts, and Xudong Zhang—for academic insights and strategic advice. It was my good fortune to have been included in Rebecca Karl’s writing group, whose members critiqued the first chapter drafts, while Rebecca herself became an inspiring role model.

In South Korea, I am grateful to all the people in and around the advertising world who participated in or supported my research otherwise, particularly Bae Seog-Bong, Ha Haeng-Bong, Kim Hung-ki, Park Jin-Ho, Park Jeong-Sun, Park Ki Hong, Park Kwang-Soon, Park Yunjin, and Yun
Jeong-ju. I am deeply indebted to In Sup Shin, for taking interest in my research, sharing his rich stories, giving advice on navigating Korea’s advertising circles, mediating introductions, supplying me with references, and sending me materials, as well as for his warmth and curiosity about my endeavors. At Seoul National University, I thank my colleagues at the Anthropology Department, and also gratefully acknowledge the research assistance of Suyu Lee, Okcheon Kim, and Yoonjung Kim.

For commenting on the whole manuscript on different occasions, I thank John Lie, Gabriella Lukacs, Laura Nelson, Robert Oppenheim, Kathryn Ragsdale, Guy Podoler, and Jun Yoo. Individual chapters and sections benefited from comments by Christian Baier, Lindsay Bell, Ksenia Chizhova, Anatoly Detwyler, Nicholas Harkness, Taejin Hwang, I-Yi Hsieh, Hyang Jin Jung, Phillip Kaffen, David Kang, Rebecca Karl, Nojin Kwak, Alice Kim, David Kim, Jimin Kim, Kim Hong-Jung, Monica Kim, Katherine Lee, Marcie Middlebrooks, Tom Looser, Arvind Rajagopal, CedarBough Saeji, and Deborah Solomon.

An earlier version of chapter 3 was published as “Quandaries of Advertising Censorship in South Korea: Freedom-Loving Censors, Smart Consumers, and Cynical Sensibility,” Anthropological Quarterly 89 (4): 1049–1079. Parts of chapter 4 were published as “South Korean Advertising as Popular Culture” in The Korean Popular Culture Reader, edited by Kyung Hyun Kim and Youngmin Choe. Those and other chapters were presented at the Center for Korean Studies at UC Berkeley, the Center for Korean Research at Columbia University, Rising Stars of Korean Studies Workshop at the Korean Studies Institute of University of Southern California, the Media in Contemporary Korea Symposium at New York University, the Korea Society in New York, Haifa University, the Songdo and Wonju campuses of Yonsei University, and the Asia Center Brown Bag series at Seoul National University. I am grateful to organizers and participants of all those events.

I received invaluable feedback during the SSRC Korean Studies Junior Faculty Book workshop in August 2015, and thank all the workshop participants. I am particularly thankful to faculty mentors John Lie and Jun Yoo, who so kindly guided me through book publishing mazes and organized a workshop for the manuscript at UC Berkeley in August 2017. At different turns of its protracted journey, the manuscript also benefited from practical advice and some cheering from Ruth Barraclough, Ted
Hughes, Hyang Jin Jung, Jiyeon Kang, Rebecca Karl, Laurel Kendall, Nan Kim, Sharon Heejin Lee, and Andre Schmid.

Finishing this book would have been much harder without friends who provided encouragement and pleasant distractions. I thank Cosmo Lee, Valerie Deacon, Inna Drobouchevitch, Alexey Dan Chin-Yu, Guy Podoler, Sebastián Patrón Saade, and Christian Baier, who at different times all heard probably much more than they wanted to about this book and its trajectory. Special thanks to Cosmo Lee, in the peace and quiet of whose coworking space, Park Slope Desk, major revisions were completed.

Finally, I commend the professionalism and courtesy of the University of Hawai‘i Press. Working with editor Masako Ikeda has been a pleasure, I thank the two anonymous reviewers for their thoughtful and generous comments on the manuscript, and gratefully acknowledge the copy editing and production team, Ivo Fravashi and Grace Wen, for seeing this book through the final stages.
